BASE SIZES IN MATCHED PLAY GAMES

In Warhammer Age of Sigmar, most distances are measured from one model's base to another model's base. In the vast majority of games, the actual size of the base is not terribly important, and you can use bases of whatever size or shape you prefer.

The only possible exception to this is matched play games. This is because matched play games are intended to be evenly balanced contests, and in these circumstances having the same model on a different sized base can become an issue. To address this, on the following pages you will find a set of suggested matched play base sizes for all of the models in the Warhammer Age of Sigmar range.

Don't worry – you don't have to rebase your model if it is not on the suggested base unless you want to (that's why these are suggested base sizes rather than mandatory ones). If you prefer not to rebase your models, just assume that the model is mounted on a base of the appropriate size when setting the model up, moving it, or measuring any distances in a matched play game. For example, if you are a veteran player using an old unit that is mounted on 25mm square bases instead of the suggested 32mm round bases, you should set the unit up, make any moves, and measure all distances as if they were mounted on the larger 32mm round bases when you play matched play games. Although this may sound a bit complicated, in practice it is actually very easy to do.

We've organised the base sizes first by Grand Alliance, and then alphabetically by faction. To find a model's suggested base size, simply look up the model's Grand Alliance and then its faction, and then read down the list until you find the model in question. The suggested base size appears to the right of the model's name. As new models are added to the Warhammer Age of Sigmar range, we will add their suggested base sizes to the list. When changes are made to the list, any changes from the previous version will be highlighted in magenta.
